Most TV-series' episodes start with a flashback to [more accurate: recap of] prior installments, introduced by the phrase "Previously on...".

The exhibition at nationalmuseum revolves around this moment that preceded shortly before - around that which has just happened.

The works of the four artists in this show are all more or less directly based on a performance: They are the result of preceding processes; remnants/ recollections of a past act; documents of an action and reports of an imaginary event. The works, however, never depict the completed act or action in its entirety and its full immediacy. What they show may be described as the cooled-down fragments of a performance. The works share the property of casting their glance backwards, turning their attention to that which has passed - and not to that which is yet to come.
